Momoyama Gakuin University (St. Andrew's University) established the Department of Sociology in the Faculty of Sociology in 1966. Opening the Department of Social Welfare in 1998, the Faculty devotes itself to the study of poverty, social inequality, and social stratification. In addition to conducting a variety of research projects, the Faculty of Sociology sponsors lectures open to the University community. Poverty is not simply an individual problem. It is related to a number of challenges in our contemporary society. Sociological studies of poverty and social stratification include social welfare policy, social security payment, inequalities among generations, gender inequality, changing social networks, and the development of civil society. This lecture focuses on social disparity in Thailand as an example of the social challenges brought on by changes in the global economy and the restructuring industries.
